I am very much a visual learner. I love getting information from pictures and charts. I am a map person (vs. GPS, which is also an infographic, but a constantly changing one), and I studied for my vet tech classes by creating my own infographic notes. I didn't know they had a name, but that's what they were! It's great to see that this medium, or genre, or whatever it is, has earned some recognition. Kudos to Best American editors for presenting this annual volume. It's easy to take the "art" side of this for granted: after all, what's so difficult about a Venn diagram or color-coded table? But if not produced by a deft hand and a sharp mind, the reader/observer is merely subjected to a lot of meaningless gobbledygook. In order to really convey its message, the infographic has to be engaging, accurate and memorable. Today, we're bombarded by visuals. We want to be able to take a "snapshot" of data and then wade in further. That's what the best of these do. The range of creativity is impressive. In short: most of the book is very, very cool. I had run across a few of these before in their original publications, but it was fun to revisit them. The book is divided into four sections: You, Us, The Material World, and Interactive. Some of these provide useful information ("The Perfect Wine for the Meal" or "How to Pick a Pope"), fun trivia ("Previously, On Arrested Development") or fascinating takes on topics we may not know much about (including baseball park design, judging surfboarders, and the species health of wild bees). "A Fire Disaster Unfolds" was interesting to me, because my husband is a Chicago firefighter.
